The black, silver and red colour scheme inspired Louis and Vicky to have an invitation that would surprise and delight their guests and since most of their friends were married, they decided to keep things interesting by mixing up the order of things a little and keep their guests guessing as to what was going to happen next!

They followed the advice given to them by Matthew from Oakfield Farm in that your wedding is essentially your own 'production' and that you should not be afraid to make it interesting and unique. The invitations were big black and white lollipops adorned with the invitation, and this theme was carried through to the table décor where there were smaller versions of the lollipops stuck into large round balls planted in silver containers. Each table had a name such as Love, Happiness or Laughter as opposed to a number.

Getting married on a Sunday afternoon instead of the conventional Saturday meant that their guests were more relaxed and while having photographs taken, guests were treated to Oakfield's famous wrap bar.

Immediately after entering the reception, Louis and Vicky opened the dance floor with all the guests gathered around, after which they proceeded to cut the cake with everyone watching—the cupcakes were a hit.

Having a live band created a lively and interesting atmosphere and the throwing of loose-stem roses ensured that most ladies received a rose.

Their two miniature Schnauzers, Mitzy and Shana were celebrity guests at their reception.

Vicky admits that she had so much fun planning her wedding, she may just decide to turn it into a career and help other brides 'Do It Differently'.
